A.J.C. Head Finds German Democracy Skin Deep, Says People Must Confront Past And Hitlerism

Dr. Joachim Prinz, president of the American Jewish Congress, charged that influential groups in Germany and the United States have launched a "systematic campaign to rewrite German history." He said the purpose of the effort was to make it appear that Hitlerism was an aberration without roots in the German past.

Dr. Prinz, a former rabbi of Berlin who was expelled from Nazi Germany in 1937, reported on a survey of social and political conditions he completed last month in West Germany. He spoke at a meeting of the Commission on International Affairs of the American Jewish Congress in Stephen Wise Congress House, 15 East 84th Street, New York.

"Some apologists for Germany claim not only that Nazism was an isolated incident in German history," Dr. Prinz declared. "They would forget the twelve years of the Hitler regime and have us think of Germany only in terms of what has happened since the end of World War II. Accordingly, they attack books like William Shirer's, 'Rise and Fall of the Third Reich,' as deliberate attempts to discredit Germany." He continued:

"The new Germany now rising in Europe cannot develop strong democratic institutions for tomorrow by denying its own history. And the American friends of Germany who seek to build a bridge between the two countries do Germany a disservice by ignoring the Nazi era and the terrible [illegible] it holds for all of mankind."

Dr. Prinz, since 1940 rabbi of Temple Beth Abraham, in Newark, N.J., added: "Only after the German people have had the courage to face their own past and purge themselves of it can they begin the moral re-education they must complete if they are to win the confidence and respect of the free world. No such moral re-education can take place by pretending that Hitler never happened, or that Germans were unaware of the vicious nature of Nazism, or that the Nazi myth of Aryan racial supremacy and all that went with it had no antecedents in German history.

"Hitlerism did happen, and the German people, for all their denials, saw that Jews had to wear the Yellow Badge on the street, saw that Jews could buy food only at night, and, finally, saw their Jewish neighbors disappear from their homes and apartments. The fact is that Hitler invented nothing. Anti-Semitism and racism had long been prominent features of German life, extending back eighty years to the Ahlwardt-Stoecker movement, which enunciated the idea of Aryan 'racial purity' and called for the elimination of Jews from German cultural and political life.

"It should also be remembered," he added, "that the nineteenth century anti-Semitic movements in Germany, which developed after the creation of a united German monarchy under Bismarck, came not as a reaction to military defeat but in response to military victory."

Dr. Prinz warned against thinking in stereotypes about the new Germany: "Just as it is wrong to assert that the people of Germany were ignorant of the excesses of the Hitler regime during the Nazi era, so is it wrong to talk of 'incorrigible Germans'. It is important to recall that there was a German liberal revolution in 1848 and a German liberal government in 1919. It is neither wise nor just to assume that the German people have no potential for democracy. But if there is to develop in Germany an important body of opinion that rejects the authoritarian and anti-democratic attitudes that have comprised the norm of German political life, it must come from within the German people themselves. It cannot be imposed from the outside."

Dr. Prinz, who spoke with leading German political and intellectual figures during his recent mission to Germany, told the meeting: "The trappings of democracy, such as a parliament and opposition political parties, do exist in Germany, but only the outward forms of the democratic process are present, and even these were created by the occupying powers, the United States, Britain, and [illegible] of the principles and ideals of democracy remains absent.

"More than ever, it appears clear that the main concern in Germany is not with building strong foundations of political liberty but with promoting economic prosperity. Democracy in Germany today is only skin deep."

The American Jewish Congress leader called for increased vigilance in rooting out ex-Nazis from positions of trust and authority in the government administration, the military, and the judiciary. He also urged substantially-increased programs of education for children and adults aimed at providing a genuine understanding of the Nazi past and a genuine appreciation of democratic values.

Dr. Prinz said: "Perhaps the most revealing indication of the failure of democracy to take firm root in Germany was the Adenauer administration's clumsy handling of the Der Spiegel affair, in which the editor of an opposition journal was arrested in Nazi fashion and the case was pre-judged by the Chancellor himself, who accused the editor of treason."

While deploring the action of the Adenauer administration, Dr. Prinz said he was encouraged by the vigorous protests made by youth groups, newspapers, and others against the Gestapo-like arrest of the magazine's editor and the padlocking of its offices. He called the public outcry against such acts the first welcome sign that there is in West Germany today a nucleus of libertarian sentiment which will [illegible] by which democratic rights are violated.

In his report, Dr. Prinz commented on recent public opinion polls indicating that eight per cent of West Germans admitted they still believed in Hitler while thirty-nine per cent said they were undecided about Nazism. "It is this thirty-nine per cent, a vast number of Germans, who must be watched carefully for signs that they may once again be swayed by the counsels of racial hatred and super-patriotism," he declared. "There is no politically significant neo-Nazi movement in Germany today and little overt anti-Semitism. But there is no doubt in my mind whatsoever, that latent anti-Semitism among the German people remains a powerful force.

"Anti-Semitism in Germany has historically been, and remains, an anti-Semitism without Jews. Because Jews never constituted more than one per cent of the German population, German anti-Semitism has had a kind of mystical quality. It was never the Jew who lived around the corner who was hated. Rather, German anti-Semitism was compounded out of a hatred of the invisible Jew and then directed, as it were, against the innocent Jewish bystander.

"Thus, anti-Semitism can remain latent among the German people even when, as today, Jews make up an infinitesimal part of the West German population, a mere twenty-two thousand individuals living among 57,000,000 Germans. All this is said not to perpetuate old hatreds or to arouse new fears but to help Germany to recognize its own past. Unless the German people confront their own national history and cleanse themselves of it, the Nazi era will remain the great traumatic experience of the German people, a trauma making impossible any genuine moral recovery or democratic developments."

Dr. Prinz said it was tragic that the menace represented by Communist East Germany should have served to divert attention from the necessity of strengthening the ideals of freedom in West Germany. "Whatever problems of anti-Semitism and excessive nationalism confront West Germany, it must be recognized that they exist in greater degree and with greater urgency in East Germany. There the Communist regime has adopted some of the positive steps taken by the Bonn government. East Germany has not only accepted but sought out the services of former Nazis whenever this course seemed to promise greater operating efficiency. Unlike the West German Republic, Communist East Germany has rejected in summary and callous fashion the request that it make material amends for the victims of Nazi persecution."

President Kennedy's speech of acceptance of the Award "Here We Have Planted Freedom", follows:

"I am honored to receive this award from an organization which, on its fiftieth anniversary, should, itself, be receiving an honor for distinguished contribution to the enrichment of America's democratic legacy. Your tireless pursuit of equality of treatment for all Americans has made a lasting and substantial contribution to our democracy.

"The men who first shaped the democratic legacy that you honor were filled with a sense of commitment and of wonder at the importance of the events in which they were participating. It was not only, as John Adams exalted, that they were to have the unique opportunity to write a new Constitution and form a new government and begin a new nation; it was also the deep conviction, as later expressed by Walt Whitman, that here we have planted the standard of freedom, and here we will test the capacities of men for self-government.

"America was to be the great experiment, a testing ground for political liberty, a model for democratic government, and although the first task was to mold a nation on these principles here on this continent, we would also lead the fight against tyranny on all continents. In short, wrote Jefferson to Adams, 'The flames kindled on the 4th of July 1776 have spread over too much of the globe to be extinguished by the feeble energies of despotism.' Although Jefferson also foresaw that to attain liberty in other parts of the globe, years of desolation must pass over.

"Almost two centuries have passed since a small, weak nation, a beachhead on a continent, began the great experiment of democracy in a world where government by

Four U.S. Life Insurance Companies To Finance Immigrant Housing In Israel

Four major American life insurance companies have signed an agreement with the Jewish Agency for Israel, Inc., which will facilitate the construction of homes for over 5,000 immigrants expected to arrive in Israel in 1963. The four participating companies are: the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Co., of Philadelphia; the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Co., of Springfield, Mass.; the State Mutual Life Assurance Co. of America, of Worcester, Mass.; and the Phoenix Mutual Life Insurance Co., of Hartford, Conn.

On the strength of this agreement, United Associates, Inc., a new Corporation formed by Jack D. Weiler and Benjamin H. Swig, two leading New York and San Francisco realtors, will finance the construction of over 2,000 immigrant housing units throughout Israel ranging from Safed in the North to Ashdot in the South. United Associates will invest $10 million in the financing of these units, including $1 million of its own capital; $4.5 million in proceeds of 15-year notes at 6¼ per cent interest subscribed by the four insurance companies; and $4.5 million in subordinated capital participation subscribed to by Chail, the Israel Economic Development Corporation.

The financing, construction and distribution of the units to be built by United Associates follows a pattern established last year by American Associates; the Massachusetts Life Insurance Co.; and the New England Life Insurance Co., which made it possible for the first time for American insurance firms to provide loans for Israel's extensive immigrant housing program through American-based [illegible].

The Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Co. as lenders, as well as Jack D. Weiler and Benjamin H. Swig as investors, are "repeaters", having participated in the American Associates as well as the United Associates transactions. Negotiations for the formation of both companies were conducted by Gottlieb Hammer, executive vice-chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel, Inc., and Maurice M. Boukstein, the Agency's attorney and counsel.

The units to be financed by United Associates will be purchased from the Israel Housing authority and leased to the Jewish Agency for Israel, Inc., a philanthropic organization which is the major beneficiary of the nation-wide United Jewish Appeal. The Agency, which will distribute the units to new immigrants as part of its over-all immigrant, rehabilitation program in Israel, will pay a fixed annual rental to United Associates to cover repayment of the initial investment and interest charges. This fixed annual rental to be covered out of the Agency's share in the United Jewish Appeal will serve to guarantee the loans received by United Associates.

As Israel's population has more than trebled during fifteen years of Independence, the construction of low-rent public housing for over one-million immigrants (the vast majority of them penniless refugees) has been one of the country's major problems. During those fifteen years, over 300,000 new housing units were constructed, a large portion of them in new development areas where some 20 new towns have sprung up in little over a decade. During the current year, it is anticipated that new arrivals alone will require about 20,000 additional housing units and the cost of the national housing program in the 1963/64 fiscal year is estimated at close to $64 million or 27.8% of Israel's development budget.

"I am well aware that the funds provided by United Associates will cover only a small part of what is needed to house Israel's newcomers in 1963", Mr. Weiler stated. "But with the establishment of American Associates and United Associates we have set a pattern which we hope to follow as [illegible] which relieves the Jewish Agency, Inc., and its agent, the Jewish Agency, in Jerusalem, from the pressure of frantic short-term borrowing to finance its share in the immigrant housing program." The Jewish Agency, in Jerusalem, the central instrumentality for the rehabilitation of new immigrants in Israel has undertaken to finance at least one-third of all immigrant housing units.

Mr. Weiler noted that the simultaneous transfer of titles and funds required for this complex

First Major Study Of Career Choices In Social Work May Lead To Solution Of Shortage Of Workers

The percentage of Jewish young men and women who are becoming social workers is almost five times as high as the percentage of Jews in the total population of the United States, a book just published by the Council on Social Work Education reveals. The book, "Who Chooses Social Work, When And Why," was written by Arnulf M. Pins, director, personnel and training services, National Jewish Welfare Board (JWB), and contains new knowledge which may provide clues to ways of solving the nation's critical shortage of social workers. Reported in the book are the findings of the first major research study of factors influencing career choices in social work.

First-year students in the 68 graduate schools of social work in the U.S. and Canada provided information for the study.

More than 14 per cent of the 2,771 social work students whose responses to questionnaires were analyzed were Jews. Only 3.01 percent of the total U.S. population is Jewish, according to the current edition of the American Jewish Year Book.

There are three methods of practice of social work: social case-work, social group work, and community organization. Mr. Pins found that 30 percent, or almost a third, of all social group work students were Jewish. Fourteen percent of the casework students were Jewish, and only five percent of the community organization students were Jewish. The large percentage of Jewish students concentrating on social group work is probably related to the fact that there are more than 350 Jewish Community Centers in the U.S. These Centers, located in practically all communities with large Jewish populations, are unique among Jewish agencies in that their primary method of practice is social group work. JWB, which is the national association of Jewish Community Centers and YM-YWHAs, has conducted an extensive recruitment program to attract new professional workers for Centers and Ys. The William J. Shroder Memorial Award Committee of the Council of Jewish Federations and Welfare Funds (CJFWF) in 1961 awarded JWB honorable mention for its Recruitment and Scholarship Crash Program.

Although the popular conception of social work is that it is a profession for women, Mr. Pins found that more than 41 percent of the students were men. This figure is only slightly higher than the percentage of people already in social work positions who are men. That figure, as revealed in a recent social welfare manpower survey, is 40 percent. One of the more significant findings of the study is that more than 80 percent of the 2,771 students had had some experience in social work before deciding on it as their life-time career. Social work is one of the few fields which offer opportunities to people to get some volunteer or paid experience before making their final career choice. Fifty-nine percent of the students in the study actually worked on a full-time basis for six months or more in a paid social work position.

A critical shortage of social welfare personnel, particularly professionally educated social workers, exists in the U.S. and Canada. It is estimated that between 10,000 and 15,000 new social workers are needed annually to fill existing vacancies, to replace those leaving the field and to staff new positions according to Ernest F. Witte, executive director, Council on Social Work Education.

Mr. Pins found that direct work experiences, college courses, and instructors, and relatives, friends, and acquaintances who are social workers did most to inform students about social work and to influence them to make it their career. He also found social work recruitment programs to be a major factor in the career choices of students. The findings also reveal that, as a group, social work students were very active in community and college organizational life. Almost half of them had lived most of their lives on the Eastern seaboard; another 20 percent came from states in central U.S. Relatively few students had lived in the far North, the Southwest, or New England. The proportion of Negro students in social work was found to be relatively high; this may be due to the lack of discrimination in employment, the shortage of social work personnel, and the fact that social work is for many Negroes a step upward, both socially and financially.

Studies of career choices have been made in the fields of medicine, psychology, education, and other areas, but this is the first major study of career choices and factors influencing them ever undertaken in the field of social work. Mr. Pins conducted the study in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Education at Teachers College, Columbia University. He holds a Master of Social Work degree from the Columbia University School of Social Work. He is a former program director of the Jewish Community Centers of Chicago.

Active also in Jewish education circles, he is on the part-time faculty of the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion. He is the author of a program manual on "Israel And The U.N.," three publications for Jewish children, and numerous articles for Jewish and professional journals. JWB's personnel and training services, of which he is the director, recruits, trains, refers, and helps place professional social group workers and other staff in Jewish Community Centers, camps and other Jewish agencies.

Mr. Pins' research was made possible by a Harry Lurie Fellowship of the Council of Jewish Federations and Welfare Funds and by a Public Health Research grant from the National Institute of Mental Health. The publication of the study was made possible by a grant from the Shell Companies Foundation.

Copies of "Who Chooses Social Work, When And Why" may be purchased from the Council on Social Work Education, 345 East 46th Street, New York 17, N.Y. The Council set standards for professional education in social work and seeks to increase the supply of qualified social workers. Members of the Council are schools of social work, national social welfare agencies, and interested citizens.

Montreal's Clark Street Sun Sponsors Its Seventh Annual Cycle Safety Test

May 18 is the date set by the Clark Street Sun, for the seventh Annual Cycle Safety Test to be held in the Devonshire School Parking Lot, on Clark Street above Pine Avenue, weather permitting. If not, the test will be held the following Saturday afternoon. This safety education project, headed by Montreal Police Lt. Andre Rousseau, of the Accident Prevention Squad, will start at 1 p.m., with Mayor Jean Drapeau officiating. The test closes at 5 p.m. Traffic circles, lights, stop signs, and many new innovations will be included in this year's event to test the participants' bicycle skills and teach correct road manners.

Sponsoring this campaign will be the teenage newspaper, The Clark Street Sun, in co-operation with the Province of Quebec Safety League, the city Police Department, as well as local establishments who will contribute prizes. The "road-eo" will be arranged on the principle that young citizens who have many years ahead of them as motorists should receive some form of public incentive to spur them on to safe riding habits. In charge of organizing the test will be sports directors, Frank Piciel, Mike Wozniak, Hilda Porfellow, and Garry Wells.

Fifteen schools in the area have agreed to support the test, with close to 800 students expected to take part. Various sports stars from the Montreal Canadiens hockey club and the Alouettes Football Club will be in attendance to sign autographs and give out prizes.

Sydney Stavitsky, son of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Stavitsky, 21 St. Cuthbert Street, is the editor.

A.J.C. HEAD FINDS GERMAN DEMOCRACY SKIN DEEP

"The development of a peaceful European community depends not only upon the political stability of Germany but even more upon the creation of a German government dedicated to humanitarian values and administered and led by men committed to the precepts of freedom. The objective in Germany must therefore be not only stability and prosperity but lasting democracy. Toward the achievement of this end in Western Germany, I am convinced that the force of public opinion in the free world can be effective and meaningful."

Since the teacher has her pupils before her for many hours a day, she is in a position to notice signs of poor health or impaired sight and hearing. By consultation with the school nurse, it is often possible for such conditions to be helped and, where necessary, treatment arranged for the youngsters.

Observations Of A Visiting Bird Watcher In Rehovoth

BY DR. WILLIAM KEMSLEY OF PITTSBURGH, PA., AS A GUEST OF THE WEIZMANN INSTITUTE'S SECTION OF NUCLEAR SPECTROSCOPY

As a casual bird watcher from Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania I recall that when we first thought of visiting Israel, its bird watching potentialities did not at once strike me as a major attraction. Since my principal field of interest is, after all, molecular physics, the accumulating evidence of important and expanding activity in that field at the Weizmann Institute had engaged my attention for some time. It was, in fact, almost entirely on the basis of scientific potentialities that we made up our minds to come to Rehovoth.

Of course, the excitement of observing what I knew to be an intensely dynamic society building in the midst of antiquity was not entirely lost on me, and I anticipated a very worthwhile time, even though it seemed certain that bird watching would have to be set aside for a while.

But it was not long after the decision was made that I came across an article by Walter Ferguson, in the Audubon Magazine, which dealt in a most enthusiastic fashion with the birds of Israel. From this description, it was apparent that far from heading for a birdless desert, I would shortly find myself in a bird watcher's paradise. Accordingly, I arrived in Rehovoth laden with binoculars, telescopes, and bird books.

Once in the field, it did not take long to realize that the glowing reports that I had read of Israel's bird life were, if anything, conservative. Constituting as it does a heavily travelled migration route, the Eastern shore of the Mediterranean is traversed by a remarkably large number of species in passage, in addition to its heavy population of seasonal visitors and permanent residents. It soon became apparent that on the campus of the Weizmann Institute, as contrasted with the streets of Pittsburgh, I could hardly afford to go forth without binoculars.

Now the habitual binocular-wearer is sure to incur certain risks. This is particularly true when he is unable to make himself understood in the local tongue. Birds seem to congregate especially thickly in front of military installations, open windows, and bikinis, but on those occasions where their presence is urgently required as evidence of good (or, at least, innocent) intentions on the part of the bird watcher, they invariably disappear.

With any sort of luck, though, a bird watcher can survive the initial disturbance created by his entry on to a new habitat and ultimately become accepted, and even understood by the indigenous population as a basically harmless crank.

In my case, this state of equilibrium with the environment was reached fairly fast. People seemed to learn quickly enough just why I scrabbled around in bushes on a never-ending search and began, obligingly, to press a steady stream of dead and dying fledglings and cat casualties on me. This is an aspect of bird-watching I find singularly distressing. Not only do I not know how to handle sick birds, but I am equally hopeless in the comforting of sick bird-bearers.

Perhaps the most important step I took towards adding to my birding experience was when I joined the Hevra Lehagenat Hateva (the Society for the Protection of Nature) wherein I received vast instruction from Amots Zahavy and his ranger protégés. Straggling at the rear of this knowledgeable band, feet blistered and binoculars covered in dust, I have limped into the remotest corners of Israel, unfailingly to be greeted by a new species or two for my life list.

Thus Ein Gedi for me is the territory of my first eight griffon vultures; Ein Hamifratz recalls my initial encounter with the imperial eagle; Wadi Siq is indelibly imprinted with a small blob of red high up on a rock wall, the Sinai rose finch.

Building on the basis which has come from a partial retention of the lessons of the Society's various trips, I have been able to make further progress under my own steam. New species continue to appear in my 7 X 35's and impressive birding spectacles, while generally ornithologically less remarkable than those revealed by the Society, are discovered with ever-increasing frequency.

Unforgettable among these was the sight of the Negev in Spring swarming with storks; gannets diving for fish from incredible heights into a stormy winter sea; and, finally, the fishponds of Ma'agan Micha'el, in all seasons and all weathers, gathering together as rich a concentration of water birds as can, I think, be found anywhere.

The heavy dose of enthusiasm to which I subject my co-workers in the laboratory after a day in the field affects them in various ways. Some are instinctively repelled by such preoccupation with unproductive activity and tend to sidle off when I show up with a fresh sunburn. Others feel an immediate challenge and are ready to charge out across the fields with me in an attempt to patch up what they now recognise as a gap in their cultural background.

To be included in this group are the covert bird watchers who may have been watching quietly for years but who never have faced up to the possibility of admitting it publicly. Once flushed, however, they are invaluable to the visitor since they will be found to be thoroughly steeped in local bird lore and nomenclature.

It is from this source, in fact, that I have acquired my entire Hebrew vocabulary, which consists wholly of the names of some dozens of Israeli birds! Finally, there is a surprisingly large sample whose reaction is some variation of "Birds! In Israel!" These are the dormant ones. They need well-spaced, properly-documented assurances that there are birds to be seen over and above the house sparrows to which they have become so thoroughly inured.

Then, the transformation takes place.

First thing one morning, a now bright-eyed convert seeks me out with the news, "I saw a bird!" This is the moment of truth. He is asking for identification of a creature which has undergone the fantastic transformation involved in being read in to and out of his birdwise virgin memory.

It begins: "He was very large." My mind starts scanning the bird book's section on eagles and vultures. "Almost as big as a sparrow." I revert to the index. Next we may go on to colour or habitat but one must be very careful not to destroy the latent image.

I am filled with curiosity concerning the colour of the carpal patches, the degree of completeness of the eye ring, the relative length of the mandibles, but I know from experience that questions like these are apt to make new enthusiasts fidget. So not all of these first encounters end happily. On the other hand, minimum evidence identification may be taken as a science in its own right, and I believe that the following data can be interpreted with a probable error of no more than 18 per cent.

"He was all bright yellow." This is the goldfinch (Hokit) as seen from the side. "He was all bright red." Here we have the goldfinch (Hokit) again, observed this time from head-on. The incredible blues of the Smyrna kingfisher (Shaldag levan kehazeh) and the Palestine sunbird (Tzufit) are likewise of an intensity to wipe out any supplementary impression from the mind of the novice.

Sometimes he can do not more than gasp "Blue!" and although the kingfisher and the sunbird have nothing in common but two entirely different blues, it takes considerable patience to extract some small additional clue to differentiate between them. The observer knows that if I could only be made to feel the brilliance of that blue, no further discussion would be necessary.

These remarks would scarcely be complete without a plea on behalf of the birds themselves. This does not constitute a suggestion that the number of bread crusts thrown to house sparrows be increased. While those fellows will undoubtedly observe the final extinction of mankind with genuine sadness, and are therefore fully deserving of our sympathy, in the final analysis their continued existence is largely independent of human attitudes.

Furthermore, while there is an appreciable overlap between bird watchers and bird lovers, I consider myself largely disengaged. On the other hand, the discovery of several dozen herons and egrets slaughtered and decomposing on a refuse heap at the foot of Mount Carmel affected me with a sense of almost personal loss.

My kids loudly assert their right not to look up from their comic books when I point out a passing flight of herons. I take no comfort from the probability that this will no longer constitute a problem in the raising of their children.

The Facts About Private Clubs In The U. S. And Religious Discrimination

EXCERPTS FROM A STUDY, PRESENTED BY BERNARD MATH, OF CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, CHAIRMAN OF THE NATIONAL CIVIC RIGHTS COMMITTEE, OF THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE OF B'NAI B'RITH, AT AN ANNUAL MEETING

Back in 1959, in his book, "The Status Seekers," Vance Packard quoted a Jewish community leader as saying: "They'll call on me to lead their community chest campaign . . . But when it comes to the country club, I'm not good enough for them."

No one appeared startled by the reference; religious discrimination by private clubs—city and country—has been taken for granted for a long time. But its extent has never been known until the Anti-Defamation League disclosed the findings of its nation-wide survey of private club practices.

Of 1,152 clubs studied, 781, an astonishing, disturbing 67 per cent, practice religious discrimination.

The 1,153 clubs include 803 country and 349 city clubs with a total membership of more than 700,000. Of the 781 clubs that discriminate, 696—90 per cent, maintain their restrictions "unofficially," without religious barriers written into their constitutions or by-laws. The remaining 85 have written-in religious restrictions. Of the 781, 640 practice total exclusion; 141 permit token membership of other religious faiths.

The ADL study concluded: the fact that two-thirds of all private clubs studied practice religious discrimination, indicates a serious failure on the part of the American community, at the social level, to accept the individual on the basis of worth and merit alone.

The League survey began with a list of all country and city clubs in the nation which employ professional managers, total of 1,332. Armed forces clubs on the list were excluded and information was not available from some of the other clubs, leaving the study with data on 1,152 clubs.

The study also evaluated the clubs according to their prestige or status in the community, setting up three categories: 1) high prestige or power-structure clubs; 2) clubs enjoying a modicum of acceptance in the community; and 3) clubs of little or no importance. Of the total, 693 were accorded the power structure rating. The study found that 60 per cent of these discriminated against Jews.

The clubs that are neither high prestige nor important in their communities also do their damage, the study said, by fostering undesirable and undemocratic social practices. Such clubs singly may be only minor sources of irritation.

In their totality, they represent a formidable expression of anti-Semitic attitudes, the results of social and economic forces which have been operating on the American scene for many decades. Since they reflect the attitudes of individual Americans, they signify that education for democracy and human relations in the United States still has a long way to go.

The study also found that religious discrimination is considerably higher in the North Atlantic states (74%) and in the Midwest (73%) than in the South and Southwest (60%) or the Far West (58%). It also found that the rate of discrimination is slightly higher in country clubs (72%) than in city clubs (60%).

The survey characterized 691 of the 781 discriminating clubs as "Christian clubs", excluding or limiting Jews. Ninety were characterized as "Jewish clubs" — operating in tragic and direct consequence to the exclusionary practices of the "Christian" ones. The fact that almost eight per cent of all clubs which were studied discriminated to one degree or another against Christians is a striking example of the further institutionalization of religious prejudice and its perverse effects.

The survey concluded that religious discrimination is far harsher and severer in American club life than it is in employment, education, and other areas, and, in the long run, may be just as damaging.

Clubs which discriminate on religious and racial ground have traditionally taken—and won acceptance for—the position that the social club is the extension of one's own parlor; that since a man has a right to choose whom he will invite into his home, he also has the right to choose whom he will admit to his club.

However, private clubs have become far more than social institutions; they are often economic strongholds in their communities. As such, their exclusionary practices are a matter of public concern.

The League study, for example, cites the words of an important industrialist who explained why he could not readily employ Jewish executives:

"It is important for our business managers that our plant managers maintain a certain status in their communities. They must join the country club and the leading city clubs. Today, that's where the big deals are discussed and made.

"They must be socially acceptable to the banking and business leaders of the town. They must be able to maintain a free and easy association with the people who count. If we promote Jewish personnel into key, sensitive positions, we run the risk of social non-acceptability. We avoid this by picking someone else," he said.

The fact that two-thirds of all private clubs in the United States practice religious discrimination has serious implications for all Americans. However, while private clubs certainly overlap into areas of great public concern, they also involve issues of the rights of privacy that cannot easily be dismissed. There is some comfort to be gathered from the fact that 32 per cent of the private clubs, including many of the most celebrated in the country, do not discriminate on [illegible]

LINCOLN AS A TRUE RELIGIOUS MYSTIC

BY SAMUEL H. SHOTTENFELD, Justice of the Supreme Court of the State of New York

The following appeared as a letter to the New York Herald Tribune:

In the centennial year of the Emancipation Proclamation — the crowning glory of Abraham Lincoln's life — it may be appropriate to note the anniversary of his martyr's death on April 15, 1865, — which he foresaw and foretold. Though the list of Lincolniana is vast, the aspect of the Great Emancipator as religious mystic does not seem to have been explored.

The new birth of freedom for the nation which he envisioned at Gettysburg had its source in the re-birth which Lincoln himself experienced on coming to the Presidency. He now perceived it to be not the consummation of a politician's dream, but rather as the awesome burden of saving the Union. "A task greater than that which rested upon Washington," he intoned in his Farewell at Springfield.

His earlier rationalism now outgrown, he accepted his inescapable mission — and destiny — with the sublime faith of a religious hero-saint: "trusting in Him who can go with me and remain with you," he told his neighbors; adding with prophetic foreknowledge of martyrdom: "not knowing whether I shall return!"

"Religion means memory," Napoleon remarked. The First Inaugural rises to the heights of a hymn in its concluding passage when it plays upon "the mystic chords of memory" in entreaty to the "better angels of our being." Indeed, if Lincoln's magnificent obsession to save the Union was to be realized, it had to be elevated to the dignity of a religious impulse with memory as its touchstone — it had to evoke a hallowed past which alone holds promise of the future.

In a notable address at the Jewish Theological Seminary on the 150th anniversary of Lincoln's birth, President Solomon Schechter said: "The dynamic of an idea or ideal was indispensable. And this idea defined by the word 'Union' was a mystical one as every religious idea is." Dr. Schechter concludes that the Second Inaugural was the greatest human, and at the same time, religious, document left us by Lincoln, for which "history hardly affords any model, except, perhaps, that of the Scriptures."

For in it Lincoln affirms God's purpose, His will and justice; and manifests a sense of national sin. Thus, the stream of mystical religious consciousness continued to the end. In the ecstasy of anguish, not of joy, Lincoln drew inspiration from the waters of salvation.

Alexander H. Stephens, the Confederacy's ablest historian, comments: "The Union with him in sentiment rose to the sublimity of a religious mysticism." And, as another eulogist remarked: "Lincoln is not a type. He stands alone — no ancestors, no fellows, no successors." He remained himself; as, indeed, every true religious mystic is unique in his own being.

PRESIDENT KENNEDY RECEIVES LEGACY AWARD

consent of the governed had been extinguished for two thousand years. As Jefferson prophesied, there have been many years of desolation and destruction. It remains for us in our responsibility in this year to assure and hope to prove that we are equal to this great inheritance, to make it possible for the four freedoms which Franklin Roosevelt so eloquently described in another time of peril and danger twenty years ago, to remain sure that those four freedoms, indeed the great concept of individual freedom, are made available to all of the people in all of our citizens' and to bear our part of the burden, as we have for so many years, in making that great concept available to all people.

"This is a great inheritance. It is a proud privilege to be a citizen of the great republic, to hear its songs sung, to realize that we are the descendants of forty million people who left other countries, other familiar scenes, to come here to the United States to build a new life, to make a new opportunity for themselves and their children.

"I think it is not a burden, but a privilege to have the chance in 1963 to share that great concept which was felt so deeply among all of our people then, to make this really, as it was for them, a new world, a new world for us, and, indeed, for all those who look to us.

"That is what this organization has stood for for fifty years. That is what this country has stood for for two hundred years, and that is what this country will continue to stand for."

transaction, had again been coordinated via teletype over a distance of 6,000 miles. He guessed that this was probably "the only $10 million transaction carried out in New York City at this particular moment." The "particular moment" being the hour of 3 a.m., corresponded to regular business hours of 10 a.m. at the Land Registration offices in Israel.

Mr. Weiler expressed his appreciation for the cooperation of the insurance companies and their local representatives in the complex task of implementing all necessary legal formalities and safeguards. "I know they have entered into this Agreement with an open-minded businessman, but I think that they will also derive satisfaction from the fact that their investments will help to put a roof over people who have come a long way to lead a new life of freedom and dignity in a young, dynamic country," he said.
